Communities in control
Real people, real power

Communities in control: real people, real power

Presented to Parliament by the Secretary of State for Communities and Local Government

Co-operation as political opportunity

Opportunities:

- Rhetorically, community offers a positive alternative to divisive policy agendas
- Practically, a re-engagement with community provides ways of rebuilding trust and solidarity

To achieve this, we need:

1. A clear, conceptual understanding of how a co-operative inspired localism agenda differs from what has gone before
2. To share practical ways of advancing it by working together

Conceptual clarity

- Neoliberal co-operation
 - Co-operation as a substitute for state welfare
 - Co-operative housing as a route to private ownership
 - Co-operatives as removed from local democracy
- Liberal co-operation
 - Co-operatives working with, rather than instead of, the state
 - Co-operatives inform political bargaining in a pluralist democracy
 - Co-operatives as part of a mixed economy/ mixed welfare model
- Communitarian co-operation
 - Emphasis on the ownership of assets and economic activity
 - A challenge to broader market activity founded in collective and democratic organisation
 - The building blocks of a new society
 - Influence of federalist models of organisation

Co-operative Council models

- Awarding public service contracts to co-operatives and social enterprises
- Joining up services and focusing them on needs as defined by users and communities
- Devolving budgets to communities and co-designing and co-delivering services with them
 - Harnessing citizens emotional and political drives to combat apathy
 - Encouraging people's sense of collective responsibility
 - Promoting and maintaining solidarity

Questions arising

1. Should we, encourage collective action by communities, And if so, how?
2. Should we promote co-design and co-delivery of services, and if so, how?
